ADDRESSING BAD TRADING HABITS

Lori McGwire
TCG Senior Analyst

Bad habits develop in all aspects of our life. Trading has its challenges and risks that can lead to substantial losses if not approached with discipline and strategic planning. One of the critical aspects that often determines the success or failure of a trader is their habits. Let's dig in and explore the common bad trading habits that many traders, both new and experienced, regularly fall prey to.

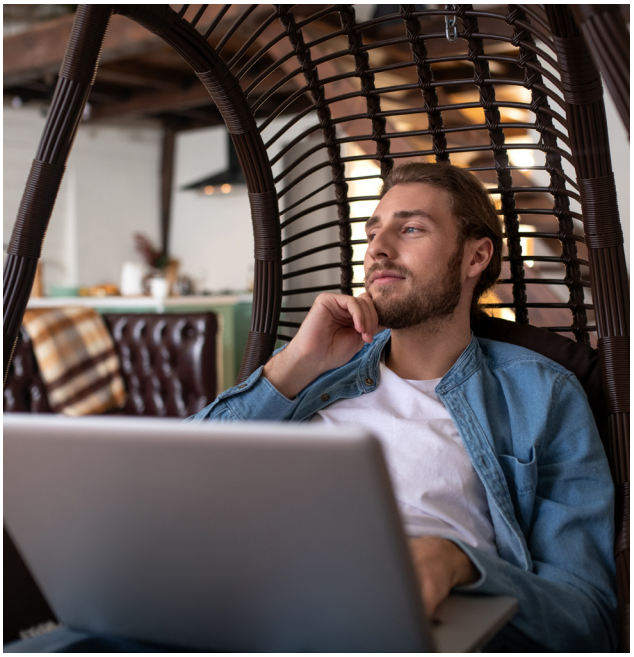
Recognizing and addressing these detrimental behaviors is essential for anyone looking to improve their trading performance and achieve long-term success.

So how do you avoid or change some of the bad trading habits that can develop?

- Preparation
- Routine and Healthy Habits
- Guardrails
- Analyzing trading results
- Limiting Focus of Tickers and Indicators
- No Chasing Holy Grails
- Staring at Profit and Loss
- Pressing on a bad day/week
- Revenge Trading
- Oversizing and Undersizing

TIPS TO HELP YOU OVERCOME BAD HABITS:

- Remove all social media and apps from your trading computer.
- Set Alerts through your charting or brokerage platform.
- Utilize brokers who have risk management parameters around shutdowns.
- Subscribe to a trade journal or create your own.
- Meditate or utilize whatever spiritual tools you have to center your thoughts.
- Create time while market is closed to create a trading plan.
- Focus on one objective per week in which to improve the inchworm concept.
- Reach out to trading buddy; this isn't to compare results or trade the same. The purpose of the trading buddy is for accountability.
- Write down your trading rules. I know this sounds so 1950, but putting a pen to paper can sometimes solidify thoughts and actions.
- Hide your Profit & Loss and Balances on your platform.
- Recognize inside day potential and low volume days early to prevent overtrading in choppy conditions.



For more useful resources, training courses, and our trading community please visit us online at...

https://chartguys.com